The growing presence of digital technology in the educational field has introduced the blended learning approach which is used in many of today's classrooms and at all levels of instruction. Without the limitations of all in-person or all online classes, this approach uses a combination of methodologies that satisfies the different learning modalities of students, whether they choose to learn in a traditional classroom or in a virtual environment. To support blended learning, teachers experiment with a lot of digital tools to develop personalized lessons and create a productive space where each learner is engaged. (Adapted from Blended Learning Organization, 4 March 2016)

Standing outside the Guggenheim Museum in Bilbao, it is hard to believe that twenty years ago this was a post-industrial wasteland. This Basque city had to find a new direction. It provides for present needs and future plans, and at the same time carries with it the impression of things past. But although language is clearly essential to humankind and has served to extend control over other parts of creation, it is not easy to specify what exactly makes it distinctive. (Widdowson H. Parents or teachers of teenagers may find it hard to believe that sarcasm is a sign of a flexible and inventive mind. Yet, that is exactly what psychologists and neuroscientists have been arguing. They have found that sarcasm requires the brain to create numerous connections to arrive at a correct interpretation, requiring more brainpower than literal statements. Although it is often considered juvenile irreverence, sarcasm is actually evidence of maturity – because it takes years for a child's developing brain to fully understand and master it. Secondly, by focusing on ethnic, language, and gender issues that can marginalize groups of people, multicultural education can help students acquire the knowledge, attributes, skills, and attitudes needed to function in adult life and in a democratic society while feeling respected and heard.
